The E-Rate program has been a phenomenal success in bringing internet access to almost every classroom in America. But we can't stop there. The world has changed and the way we live, learn and work has changed. Most importantly there are now new literacies required to be a successful and productive as a citizen in a global world. If our children graduate from our schools not being literate in the very skills that will enable success then aren't we adding to the chasm between the haves and the have nots? In the last funding cycle, applications from schools and libraries requested a total of more than $5 billion—twice the amount of available funding. I respectfully urge the FCC to increase funding for the E-Rate program to at least $5 billion to meet this demand. All students need access to high-speed broadband in or to become productive tax paying members of society. Our nation's future depends on their success.
